Today the Los Angeles Board of Supervisors will vote on a proposal that would permit film production in the Metro area. The details of how the film industry will look will likely be determined by local stakeholders, but early drafts show that the proposal would allow for local production as an offset to tax credits, and permit the building of soundstages and shooting locations. Several films, including Ant-Man and X-men Apocalypse, have already been shot in California. On Saturday, a crew of about 40 people began shooting the new, untitled X-men film in the San Fernando Valley. Supervisor Mark Ridley-Thomas is sponsoring the measure. "A fiscal note prepared by Los Angeles County's office of legislative analysis reveals that the film industry creates $350 million a year in local business and creates 4,000 jobs. By allowing our production industry to flourish here in the county, more than $1 billion in economic impact would be created for our region over the next ten years," Ridley-Thomas said in a statement. "A film hub in Los Angeles has been a longtime goal for our county." The issue has gained significant traction since last summer. In August, Ridley-Thomas and Supervisor Z t678ea9f9e
